THE JOURNALS OF ANDRÉ GIDE

VOLUME 1: 1889-1913

LLOYD MORRIS, New York Herald Tribune Book Review: "Today, at...seventy-eight, André Gide is indisputably the greatest of living French writers. . . His creative fertility is undiminished; his fame and influence continue to expand; each rising generation of Europeans discovers itself in his books. It is obvious today that Gide must be counted among those who have contributed significantly to forming the contemporary mind and spirit, to making our world what it is."

"The journals...have an interest that transcends the personal, great as that is and richly as they reward it. For Gide's spiritual and intellectual evolution was in many respects prophetic of that undergone by two succeeding generations. The portion recounted in the present installment of the journals...speaks eloquently for the experience of thinking men in our time."

HARVEY BART, New York Times Book Review: "The current volume is all that a journal should be: often thoughtful and intimate, just as often bored and gossipy, or sombre, or amused, or detached, or vivacious, instinctively well-paced... a mirror reflecting impeccably the artistic milieu of a stimulating period. And underneath it all, like a ground bass supporting the variations above, is a superior intelligence."

"There are the famous, who become a little more vivid and dimensional through Gide's sighs... the concerts, theatres, exhibitions, friends, the Nouvelle Revue Française... the work in translations... the political involvements and juridical obligations, the scientific pursuits, the fame—as the greatest living literary figure of France—that he had to contend with."
